lapses in Thinking By the person i Am

The Edna S. Tuttleman Gallery
In the context of the gallery, it could be said that the composition, lighting, and general style of Josephine Pryde’s photographs recall fashion and portrait photography, but this would ignore the fact that fashion and portrait photography refer to art photographs, snapshots, documentary footage, and more. Or, as the artist and writer Melanie Gilligan put it in her recent essay “The Overt and the Obstinate,” “certain of Pryde’s pictures mobilize some of photography’s most debased popular cultural forms in order to crash them and produce newly assembled relations from the wreckage.”

Here, Pryde shows more than twenty photographs of hands shot with a macro lens so that detail can be enlarged in the final frame. The hands have brightly painted nails and are depicted in contact with a range of touch-sensitive surfaces—lamps, tablets, phones, human chests. Curator Jamie Stevens writes of this series, “[t]hese images act as a potential record of how hands are being used today and become a close analysis of a new body semiotics that has arrived with ‘smart’ technologies.” We have always thought with our hands—building, gesturing, inventing. What is new, and what Pryde has turned her lens onto in these images, is the way our mental processes can now be extended and broadcast via our fingertips. There is a responsive potential from anytime and anywhere to anytime and anywhere.

To which, what to make of the 1:10 scale model Union Pacific two-car freight train running through the gallery? Modeled and designed to be as accurate as possible, this train has functioning sounds, scale-accurate tagging by a graffiti artist, and in the one deviation from realism, cushioned seating, offering visitors a short trip from A to B and back again, along the route of the show. Tempting as it may be to read this short trip as an absurdly dry deflation of engagement and interactivity as the critical and audience spectacle they’ve become in recent international exhibitions, this line of thought is only one route. The train is transportation; the photographs may be viewed on foot; alternatively, the train offers visitors a slow-paced, pleasant way to sit and glimpse the photographs as they pass.

The miniature nature of the train may for a moment connect a viewer to the closely cropped framing of the photographs, the smallness of smart devices, the inquisitiveness of touch. For just a moment, we may reflect on how our thoughts need not be where our bodies are, or even at a one-to-one scale.
